An address from GCHQ
Director Sir Jeremy Fleming

Sir Jeremy Fleming Director of GCHQ — the United Kingdom's intelligence, cyber and security agency — delivered this speech on 31 March to the ANU National Security College.
Good morning and thank you Rory for the introduction.
And thanks to the National Security College for hosting this event in this fabulous building. I can't tell you how good it is to be back in Australia and especially to see friends and colleagues here in Canberra.
Now, it's stating the obvious to point out that the World has changed since my last visit: the pandemic, the profile and dominance of technology and cyber, the role of China, the end of the Afghan campaign and now Putin's invasion of Ukraine.
Any one of these could be viewed as a historic shift. Taken together, they add up to a period of generational upheaval. The economic, social and geo-political consequences are still playing out — and will do for decades to come.
And that's obviously the case in the world of National Security. Here too, the threats we face and our approaches to their mitigation are changing rapidly.
There's much talk of the need to design a new global security architecture. My contention is that it is already happening. It is already different.
